Trezor Safe 5 FAQ: What Families Need to Know

Print this, keep it with your important papers, and make sure the person who will one day settle your estate can find it.

Is the Trezor Safe 5 safe?

Yes, for the threats most people actually face. It keeps your private keys on an offline device with a certified secure element, and its open-source firmware can be independently verified rather than taken on trust. The one thing it cannot protect against is a carelessly stored recovery seed, so treat the seed as the real key.

What happens to the crypto if the owner passes away?

It stays exactly where it is, locked to the recovery seed, and reachable only by whoever holds that seed. There is no company to call and no password reset, so without the seed and clear instructions, the coins can be lost for good.

Can family recover a Trezor without the recovery seed?

No. Without the seed there is no way to restore the wallet, by design. The same wall that keeps thieves out keeps your family out too, unless you have left them a secure path to the seed while you were able.

Where should the recovery seed be stored?

Offline, away from the device, and protected from theft, fire, and water, never as a photo or a note on a phone. A metal backup plate in a safe or a safe deposit box is common, and Shamir backup can split the seed so no single copy is a point of failure.

How do you set up a Trezor Safe 5?

Verify the device is genuine with its built-in check, install Trezor Suite, set a PIN, and write the recovery seed on paper. Add a passphrase or Shamir backup for extra protection. The whole process takes about fifteen minutes.

Trezor Safe 5 or the newer Safe 7?

The Safe 5 covers the core job well at a lower price and suits most holders. The Safe 7 adds an open-source security chip and wireless connectivity for people who want auditability all the way down to the chip.
